Speaker promotes news blogs

By FRANKIE ADDIEGO
Staff writer

Ohlone's annual high school journalism conference began with a keynote address by Marian Liu, the pop music writer for the San José Mercury News.

She talked about interviewing various celebrities, such as Bono and U2, who she was scheduled to interview last weekend.

Liu also described her pioneering use of a web log to augment her reporting. Many observers think blogs will lead the way to a new form of journalism, eventually replacing newspapers.

She described her experiences working at different newspapers, including the Los Angeles Times and the San José Mercury News, where she currently serves as a pop culture writer.

Among the experiences she recounted were backstage interviews, stories on youth culture, and writing a personal account of friends who had died of cancer.

Students attended a series of eight workshops, including one on digital photography. Sheri Wargo, Monitor photo editor and advertising manager, said, "I was very impressed by the knowledge of the students."

Erica L. Craven, of the San Francisco law firm Levy, Ram & Olsen, discussed student press rights. Some of the topics that came up included protecting information and sources, and access to court records.

Aleta Watson, food critic for the San José Mercury News, ran a popular workshop on restaurant critiquing. Watson, discussed the process of going to a restaurant anonymously to sample the food.

Newspaper critique sessions were by The Chronicle's Jim Rose, Glenda Chui of the San José Mercury News, and UC Berkeley's Chris Marshall. Winners included Eric Day of Milpitas High School for On-Site Sports; Jasmine Lee, California High School, Opinion; and Jason Chou of Mission San José High School in News Photo. California High School took first in General Excellence.
